A look at the latest reporting shows that the standards for rape reporting are being reported to have been lowered across America. We were pleased to see the president and secretary of the Department of Education focus on the issue in the “Choosing a College” video, however, with the latest data we are deeply concerned. Of the schools that require a “preponderance of the evidence” in order to report an incident, a 1998 article in the Journal of American College Health, found that in 33 of the 49 studies reviewed, almost none of the schools were seen to meet this very low standard for reporting. Furthermore, within the area of sexual assault, the Center for Disease Control recently found that under federal law, only two out of five college campuses that they visited had an adequate policy on the issue of reporting. Higher education is by no means a safe environment for sexual assault, as is evident by the statistics. In fact, according to a recent article in the Chronicle of Higher Education, one in five women are raped while in college. America cannot tolerate this level of abuse against the most vulnerable members of our society and the Justice Department has a responsibility to make college campuses safe from such abuse.

Fortunately, today the Justice Department is reviewing the issue of sexual assault on college campuses. It is our hope that the president and members of the department will be diligent in their efforts to ensure that campuses are safe for students and create positive change in the way these crimes are reported and dealt with. As to the latest data, current reporting requirements are found in the “Dear Colleague” letter issued by the Department of Education. Below are some statistics on some of the issues raised in the letter. In instances where charges are filed, the prevalence of a college’s reporting rates was calculated by comparing the number of investigated charges during the previous academic year with the number of charges reported by campus. Findings indicate that on average, schools investigated 0.13% of all possible charges and reported 0.25% of those reported. The 1998 study reviewed 49 instances in which charges were filed against one or more offenders. In those instances, 42 (86%) of those schools failed to meet the requirements. Q: How to hide/remove a using jquery? How to hide/remove a tag using jquery? I am also looking for example A: If you are removing a script, use the remove() method: $('script').remove(); I think if you are hiding them in the first place, that won't be necessary. A: Try the following: // hide $('script').hide(); // disable (or show) $('script').prop("disabled",true).show(); $('script').prop("disabled",false).show(); // remove $('script').remove(); A: There are multiple ways to do that. First of all if you already have jQuery included in your page then you can use the basic.hide() and.remove() method from jQuery. When you want to keep the script and have it execute when the page has been fully loaded for example, you should use the load method from jQuery. See my example below: `$(function() { // jquery code here });` Finally, you can hide any inline element such as your script tag through your browser's HTML inspector. For Chrome you can right click on the element and choose the 'Inspect' option. For Firefox you can use the 'View Source' option from the element menu.
